Freed from the prettifying influence of official commissions, the calligraphy and painting of Zen masters became simple and direct, a form of active meditation. Stephen Addiss, who teaches art history at the University of Kansas, has gathered 117 lovely "ink traces," brushed uncorrected on silk or absorbent paper between 1600 and 1925. Each monk's rendering of a traditional subject - a one-stroke circle, the bug-eyed Zen patriarch Bodhidharma or a simple phrase - is as singular as a thumbprint. In the Zen master Hakuin's "Blind Men Crossing a Bridge," three antlike forms feel their way across a precipice; the calligraphy draws the parallel with unawakened daily life. Mr. Addiss's text illuminates but never overwhelms the art, much of it reproduced in color for the first time. His most detailed description of the process of Zen art describes the painting in 1916, of a 21-foot banner - now lost - with a five-foot inkbrush. "Hitching up his robe, [the monk Nantembo] took up the brush in both hands, splashed it into the bowl of ink, had it squeezed partly dry by an attendant, took a deep breath into his stomach and called out 'Katsu!' . . . the brush moved with the sound 'sa-sa-sa' and droplets of ink splattered on the faces of the onlookers . . . he suddenly kicked the brush with his right foot, splashing the ink all the way up to the ceiling boards of the temple." Nantembo's ghostly handprint, surrounded by empty space, below the simple inscription, "Now listen!" is one of the last "ink traces" in this comprehensive and beautifully executed book.
